SLIPSHOD TITLES;

OR,

THE NEGLECTED ART OF COMPOSING THE TITLES OF MEDICAL PAPERS.

In the Editorial Office of the Index Catalogue of the Army Medical Library the medical publications of all lands meet for proper registration and assignment to duty under the subject group in which they can do the best work for the advancement of science. This office resembles the central receiving bureau of a large warehouse, where thousands of articles packed in small boxes or even in huge cases arrive weekly; their containers are labeled by the manufacturers of the articles, and whoever registers them in the warehouse has to rely upon the correctness of the original labeling.

It is not the task of the registrar to open each box or case unless there be some suspicious circumstance. Likewise it is not the duty of the registrar of medical literature to check on the labeling of scientific publications by reading them unless there seems to be something "fishy" in the title. When he puts the articles on proper "shelves" in that bibliographical warehouse, the Index Catalogue, he has to rely upon the titles selected by the writers.

Indeed, the title for the publication is its label which distinguishes it from others of the same sort. It is a sign or shield to hang up in front, a token to be accepted for what it stands for; in short a proper name to designate the bearer through centuries to come. It is moreover the first line which hits the eye of the public, for here is a card of introduction to the reader, perhaps we might say it is a letter of recommendation. One has to be very careful therefore, in selecting the proper words and phrases.

Reading several hundred thousand titles yearly, the registrar of medical literature gradually develops an extraordinary special sense for judging the value of books and papers by their titles, and for their assignment to a proper place according to their importance in science and literature. Well, here is his warning to medical authors:

Experience shows that the selection of title is influenced by many factors such as the current fashion, the race and nationality of the author, his education and professional knowledge, his personal style of life, the commercial ideas of the publisher, and last but not least, the editor's blue pencil. The effect of some of these factors may be so detrimental to the title that the publication itself is deprived of its present or its future value.

The authors should be on guard especially against the influence of fashion. A good-looking title may sound ridiculous after a few years. Today's literary fashion dictates such titles as: "How I hit 'em"; "Bass in the Grass"; "Science for the Citizen", &c. All these may be appropriate for books or articles written for laymen, but would be hardly dignified for a scientific paper.

The race or nationality of the author often is responsible for the length of the title. Anglo-Saxon nations like them shorter than do Latin people or Oriental authors. Titles of some French papers extend sometimes to four or five lines, and could be called summaries. The personality of the author is the sub-conscious factor in the selection of phrases, terms bombastic or modest. It also guides the writer's pen in stopping at the appropriate point.

ARABIC MEDICAL MANUSCRIPTS IN THE ARMY MEDICAL LIBRARY

Among the many cultural treasures which fled from the bombing and general destruction in the Old World to the United States was the priceless collection of a well-known Arabic scholar, who wants to be known only as a citizen of England. For more than forty years he had traveled in the countries of the Mussulman from Fes through Cairo to Bagdad, purchasing manuscripts in Turkish, Persian and Arabic languages which had been in the libraries of sultans, on the bookshelves of imams, and in the tents of sheikhs of the deserts.

Throughout his forty years of nomad life this scholar acquired some 4,000 oriental manuscripts dealing with all sorts of subject matter, but only about 120 are of medical or pharmacological interest. They are treatises, longer monographs or medical textbooks of famous Arabic physicians, and they represent both a chronological and a geographical cross-section of the rise and fall of Arabic medicine, from the 9th century of the Christian era.

Though the Army Medical Library is considering the purchase of the entire medical part of this Arabic manuscript collection, it was possible to get only a selected half of the medical classics offered to the library. Among the 63 manuscripts acquired by the library in December of 1940 there are copies of the works of such celebrated physicians as Hunain ibn Ishaq, Rhazi, Ali ibn Abbas, Ibn Sina (or Avicenna), Ibn Butlan, Ibn Rushd (Averroes), Ibn al-Daitar, Ibn Hafis, and many others. The manuscripts date from different centuries. The oldest one in the purchased collection is the al-Hawi of Rhazes, which has been written in 1094 A.D., just before the beginning of the Crusades.

The importance of the acquisition of such a collection of Arabic medical manuscripts need not be emphasized to any scholar of medical history. Many of these have never been translated or published in print. Many of them are rare, several being unique, and never before described. Those who know the significance of Arabic medicine throughout Western Europe of the Middle Ages, and those who are aware of the important role Arabic physicians played in preserving for us the ancient science and culture of Rome and Athens, the medical art and knowledge of Hippocrates and Galen will learn with satisfaction and with a sort of patriotic pride that one of the finest and largest collections of Arabic medical manuscripts is now close to them, ready to serve the medical historian and his increasing interest in the history of the caliphates.

C.F.M.

There is no doubt that the authors should keep all these factors under control, and they should be guided by the leading idea of the article in selecting an adequate title for it. A thorough knowledge of the subject matter, a few hours of reading some special works on the art of writing, together with a few hours consideration of the most suitable combination of words will be all that will be required for the composition of a good title.

There are but two kinds of title, good and bad. It has been our experience that books and papers with good titles are generally worth reading or consulting. Unfortunately for their authors, there are still a number of valuable papers and occasionally books that do not get proper recognition owing to a badly chosen title. On the other hand, most of the publications with manifestly bad titles are either empty of ideas, or written in a slovenly manner, without a genuine mental urge for communicating new thoughts or old thoughts in a new light; they are mostly written from pruritus scribendi, often with neglect of grammar and with no pretense to style, in an orgy of every day hospital or laboratory slang. Bad titles often show the mental confusion of their authors, and their inaptitude for seeing with the clear sight of a true scientist through the perplexities of medical problems.

A good title for a medical paper is (1) short and comprehensive; it contains the main subject, the essential idea of the article, without going into details, which properly belong to the summary at the end of the paper. It is (2) clear in its words and phrases, avoiding unusual or new words, slang expressions, and abbreviations. It is (3) in good style according to the manner of the article itself; it should convey something touching upon the importance of the article, and should not disappoint our expectations too much. When reading a title such as "Glossus tumor; report of a case", we know what we will find in the paper. It is an excellent title: short, clear, and in accordance with the serious character of the article.

A bad title often lacks virtue because of (1) its length, (2) its words and phrases, and (3) its style. It may be too short, but it is generally too long. If too short, it becomes so general that it will be lost for future studies. If too long, it is too difficult to find the leading idea of the author without reading the paper, and to classify it under its proper subject. Such articles may easily go astray in the throng of literary products. The unnecessary repetition of words or the use of misleading terms is often the cause of the lengthiness and the confusing character of bad titles. Not intending to embarrass our American scientist, we do not wish to quote bad examples. As a prophylactic against bad titles we blackboard the one made up by a Japanese in German language, the exact translation of which is as follows: "On the experimentally congested kidney; on the effect of the specific antikidney-serum upon the congested kidney on which I made my experiments". This would probably have won first prize in any contest.

Behold !! and beware !!
